

"A little gem of humanity"

Roxane guides us through a fascinating and frighteningly lucid reflection on the meaning of human adventure, by understanding that nothing in our lives will be resolved without maximum effort.

And if I want to save the world, I have to pay more than I would to destroy it. Because everything that's cheap corresponds to everything that's bad for nature - it's unbearable!

By making nature, work, health, food, energy and therefore our lives cheap - in other words, by giving them a market value - we are ruining the planet. And it's all snowballing: everything points to the fact that climate change is much faster and more extreme than the most alarmist models predicted.

In three years' time, we will have reached a point of no return in our ability to control the planet's temperature. We have done irreparable harm. It is therefore vital, for the world's leaders and for every citizen, to identify the line between "real" and "false" emergencies, in the name of which values?

Roxane questions our relationship with power: what options will we choose? Basically, her work is about free will, commitment and courage. For Roxane, the time for urgency is over, the time for compromise is now: "It's already later than you think!"
